CROSS-STRAIT POLICY (C-AL5-01647)

11. (C) Ref A reports on the new economic ministers in Taiwan. After discussions with a range of interlocutors it appears unlikely that the new cabinet will push for liberalization of cross-strait economic ties. A senior banker suggested to AIT/T that while he sees many of the new appointees as political ideologues, in particular the new Finance and Transportation ministers, it is too early to say exactly what policies the cabinet will implement. However, many of his business colleagues have already made up their minds. AmCham Executive Director Richard Vuylsteke told AIT/T that he expects little progress on cross-strait issues during the remainder of Chen Shui-bian's term. A local lawyer in the financial sector summed up his view as "another two years wasted." The pessimistic tone was practically uniform across the range of interlocutors.

Economic Development Advisory Commission?

12. (C) One ray of hope is that the Administration may convene the Second Economic Advisory Commission (EDAC), once the dust has settled from the Lunar New Year break and the Cabinet reshuffle. A small minority in the business community see the EDAC as an opportunity for the Chen Administration to float some liberalization policies and get a general consensus to move forward in certain areas. However, it is far too soon to say how this might work out. The idea for the second EDAC has never been clearly defined and has already undergone a number of variations. Originally it was to exclude any KMT participation, but after the December 3 DPP election setback the EDAC was redefined to be inclusive. At one point Vice Premier Wu Rong-I was to organize the effort, but he has now left the scene and no one seems to know now if there will be a second EDAC or not. KMT Vice Chairman Chiang Ping-kun told AIT/T that he has advised KMT Chairman Ma Ying-jeou that if an EDAC is held it should be strictly without any type of political participation. He said that people of all political stripes should participate, but that they should do so only in their capacity as business representatives, technical experts or academics.
